A new editor takes over

With this edition of the Dalhousie Alumni Magazine we welcome a new editor, Marian Bruce.

This is the second time that I have had occasion to comment on her addition to the staff of a publication with which I've been associated. In 1981, as editor of Atlantic Insight magazine, I appointed her managing editor, a position she held until 1984 when she returned to the editorial staff of the Montreal Gazette to renew old acquaintances, make new friends (like Dal alumni Janet Creaser and Tim Hutchins, whom she has written about in this issue's cover story, page 8) and generally look for excuses to come back to the Maritimes. An irresistible one turned up earlier this year when Harry Bruce (no relation) left his position as editor to pursue other writing interests. Marian came down from Montreal in the teeth of a howling February snowstorm that might have shaken the resolve of anyone with less affinity for the east coast than she has. In the balmy days of early May, she arrived to officially assume the editorship.

She comes from Prince Edward Island (High Bank, near Montague) and graduated from Prince of Wales College, now part of the University of P.E.I. During a 20-year career in print journalism, she has worked for major newspaper and magazine publications in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal, studied under Marshall McLuhan at University of Toronto, lived in France and made a reputation as a thorough professional who is very, very good at what she does.

The past few years have seen an unprecedented period of growth for the Alumni Magazine. We have won several national and international awards under Harry Bruce's editorship and, more importantly, we've broadened and strengthened our contacts with alumni all over the world. Our commitment is to bring you more of the same — and better. With this in mind, it's a pleasure to welcome Marian Bruce to the magazine, to Dalhousie and back to that part of the country she likes best.

Friend-raising is her business

And she's good at it. But alumni affairs director Heather Sutherland won't be happy until she finds those 18,000 alumni that are lost

by Roma Senn

Nearly every student at Heather Sutherland's American alma mater knew about the alumni association well before he or she graduated. Not so at Dalhousie. But Sutherland, who is director of alumni affairs, is out to change that. Since she took on the job five years ago she's scrambled to get her office known on campus and off. Her constant thought: "Where am I going to go next in building our visibility? We can never be too visible."

Or have too many friends. Sutherland, who's soft spoken but in her own words a hustler, describes her job as friend-raising. With such programs as an exam survival kit, phone-the-frosh, gourmet dinners and wine-tasting evenings, she's made new friends and supporters for the alumni association and Dalhousie. By beefing up alumni programs, she's helped lessen what used to be a common perception: "The only time I ever hear from Dal," alumni used to say, "is when it wants money."

The university decided to separate the jobs of fund-raising and friend-raising when Sutherland got the job. She set to work to build new alumni programs and expand old ones. The job seems almost tailor made. She has a strong background in university affairs. A native of Woodstock, N.B., Sutherland holds a Master of Education degree in student personnel services in higher education from the University of Maine in Orono. She's been a residence director, a housing and financial aid officer and a lecturer. As a student she worked in such areas as alcohol awareness and as a peer sexuality counselor.

Coming to Dalhousie, she had her work cut out. "I had to bring the program from square one." It's been a challenge. "I felt I had only upwards to go." Improved record-keeping has been a priority. Since 1982, her office has updated addresses for 6,000 alumni. But 18,000 are still invalid — that's 34 per cent of Dal's 54,000 living alumni. (An alumnus is anyone who has attended Dal for at least a year.) "That's always a sore point with me," Sutherland says. Although the university has an alumni program that stacks up well with other major Canadian universities, its record-keeping is the worst in the country. Students are helping in the search, going through telephone books and "anything we can get our hands on." For Sutherland, success is tied to finding lost alumni. "We will be successful when that number lessens."

The spring reunions are a success. All former students are invited to a weekend of fun and meeting old friends every May. Ten classes, from the 15th to 60th graduating class, receive special recognition. Everyone wines and dines on lobster, attends continuing education lectures and tours the campus. This year during the alumni association's annual meeting and dinner, the guest speaker was Mike Duffy, CBC TV's parliamentary correspondent.

Alumni branch receptions keep the office busy. Over the winter Sutherland visited Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto and Bermuda. In June the alumni association was host at a reception to coincide with a national convention of physiotherapists and occupational therapists in Saint John. A number of branch receptions are planned for the Atlantic provinces in the fall.

One-third of all Dal alumni live in the Halifax area and the alumni office has developed a program designed to lure them back to campus. "We're working against the myth that they know what is going on at Dal," Sutherland says. Chili on ice is a hot attraction. Three years ago 20 showed up for skating, chili dinner at the Faculty Club and a Tigers hockey game. This year the event sold out, with 200 attending. "It's the best deal in town," says an unbiased Sutherland. Such popular events offer Sutherland a good chance to court alumni. "We'd like to get them involved with the university." Many of the events are aimed at young families. Half of the alumni are under 45.

The alumni program offers something for everyone: social, arts, recreation and educational activities. Besides the popular wine-tasting evenings, you can get tips on resume writing, downhill and cross-country skiing and investment. This year for the first time the alumni office and the student union invited prominent alumni back to Dal to deliver the "Homecoming" lecture series. Three premiers — Nova Scotia's John Buchanan, Prince Edward Island's Joe Ghiz and New Brunswick's Richard Hatfield — joined Nova Scotia New Democratic Party leader Alexa McDonough and Manitoba Liberal Party leader Sharon Carstairs. On the social side, alumni recently flocked to the comedy production Time and Time Again at the Dalhousie Arts Centre. (All alumni who present their alumni identification cards get a discount.)

With the alumni association, Sutherland has worked out a clutch of good deals for alumni: cheaper life insurance, travel, reduced membership fees at Dalplex, commemorative university watches, limited-edition prints.

She views the alumni program as "an investment in Dalhousie's future" and says it's important that the door swing both ways. If alumni are offered a strong program, she believes, they will want to do something for Dal. She's worked hard to sell this idea on campus to the staff and faculty — one-third of whom are alumni themselves. When she first joined the university, her office staff called her "the phantom." She was always out of the office making her pitch.

But she has always found time for one of her favorite parts of the job: working with the students. "They have so much enthusiasm," she says. She's active on the quality of student life committee, which organizes such activities as a student leadership conference covering topics that include time management, delegating tasks, campus rules and regulations. The committee has arranged a tutoring service, helped with temporary housing and assembled welcome kits. With alumni in Truro and Bermuda, she's piloted a project to phone students Dalhousie has accepted for admission. "It helps personalize the university community," she says.

Even though Sutherland has her hand in many pots, she'd like to see her office involved in more. But lack of money restrains her. She dreams of a fall homecoming, more specialty reunions, a larger social program for Halifax-area alumni, the formation of more chapters. (Only New York and Bermuda have formed chapters.)

Sutherland is pleased but certainly not complacent about the progress in alumni programs. "I want to take us from very good to first class. I'd like ours to be one of the best." □

Getting to know you: the computer connection

When Mary Crowley of Dal's education department noticed that computers can help people open up, she decided to try working with sick children

When students at five Nova Scotia schools began talking by computer this year with kids in Oregon and Alberta, everybody learned something, including project organizer Mary Crowley of Dalhousie's education department.

Students at Halifax's Gorsebrook School, for instance, learned about the geography of the dune-studded coast of Oregon and what it's like to be a Cambodian refugee growing up in the western United States. A class of sixth-graders in Salem, Ore., became familiar with the schooner Bluenose and the Halifax explosion.

For Crowley, an education professor in the field of computers and mathematics, the project provided evidence that computers affect not only the way people communicate, but also what they say.

And that discovery inspired her to explore the idea of using the computer as a therapy tool for sick kids.

"We have found that in using telecommunications, people are often very frank when they talk to each other," Crowley says. "We don't quite understand it yet. It's an anonymous audience, yet people seem to say things directly."

The day the U.S. space shuttle exploded in February 1986, she recalls, she was working with another group of students who were communicating by computer. "The kids got on line, talking about why this had happened and how they felt about it, and I think this helped these kids mourn."

This year's project, organized in cooperation with Maritime Tel and Tel, used Telecom Canada's Envoy electronic mail and bulletin board system to link 12-to-14-year-old students in the Nova Scotia schools — in Halifax, Shad Bay, Antigonish, Canso and Westmount — with each other and with schools in Calgary, Alta., and Salem, Ore.

The idea was not to teach computer science, but to use computers as a teaching tool.

"We wanted to give teachers a different way to motivate students," says project administrator Joy Aberback, a Dal graduate student in education. "And they opened up immediately."

The students, even those who were reluctant at first, took part enthusiastically.

"The kids in Halifax were talking to Oregon about what makes Nova Scotia unique," Aberback says. As a result, they started researching their province's history.

Even within the province, the results were illuminating. Shad Bay is only a half-hour drive from Halifax, but the rural and city students probably would not have had any contact without the project. One piece of information that fascinated the city kids was the fact that the father of one Shad Bay student is a blacksmith.

One child from the Halifax school, Gorsebrook junior high, was too ill to attend school for five months, but hooked up to the Envoy system from home to participate with her class. The day she returned to school, Crowley says, a stack of messages came in on the computer from the Oregon school.

"She was sure there would be no messages for her, but in fact there were, because nobody at the Oregon school had known she was different from the other students, and that made her feel good. She also hadn't lost touch with her peers while she was away."

The pilot project started in January and wound up in May, but at least one of the Nova Scotia schools has the funds to continue this fall. Gorsebrook resource teacher Judith Langille says she hopes her students will be able to start communicating with kids overseas. "It's the best motivator I've ever seen," she says of the communications network.

The experience with the Gorsebrook child who was ill has led Crowley to explore ways of working with other sick children.

She's hoping to find funding to start a computer project in August or September at Halifax's Izaak Walton Killam Hospital for Children. A computer hook-up with schools would let sick kids stay in touch with their teachers and other students.

In addition, Crowley is hoping to link patients at the Killam with kids in other hospitals. "We're hoping that sick kids will be able to talk to each other, talk about their problems and how they feel, and to help each other."

The computer could also become a conversational point on the hospital floor, Crowley believes, helping shy patients to develop more contacts with people around them.

Why does communicating by computer tend to open people up?

Crowley's still working on that puzzle. From her personal experience, she suggests it has something to do with the fact that sending a message by computer is faster than writing a letter and less intimidating than a phone call.

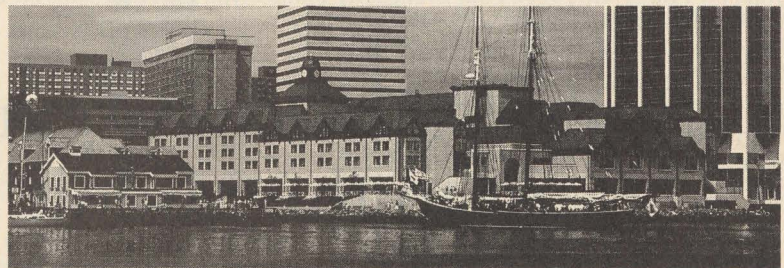

"I have found, from working with these children in the schools, that I was more willing to say some things to children I haven't seen face to face than I was to say them to my own children. There's something safe about it. Last Remembrance Day, when I was trying out the system, a 13-year-old girl in one of the schools sent me a message asking what I had done that day. I described being in Point Pleasant Park, and how I saw a man come up and touch the (soldiers') memorial. I was practically in tears when I saw this and when I wrote about it.

"But I felt safe writing it, because I could control how I sent the message and still got the emotion out." □

Dal's art gallery organizes a salute to the Middle Ages

It will be positively medieval: sword-to sword combat outside the Dal Arts Centre, dances, feasts and madrigals by mandolin-playing minstrels.

The festivities are in honor of a rare exhibition of art from the Middle Ages at the Dal Art Gallery Aug. 27 to Oct. 11.

The show — the first major exhibition of works from the Middle Ages in Canadian collections — consists of 47 examples of medieval art and artifacts, including wood sculpture, paneling, paintings, tiles, furniture, stained glass and illuminated manuscripts.

"It will be the chance in a lifetime to see this material," says gallery director Mern O'Brien. "You'll never see it again. We'll be exhibiting art works such as pieces of stained glass that date back to 1415."

The show is a travelling exhibition organized by the MacKenzie Art Gallery at the University of Regina, with funding from the National Museums of Canada Corp. The Dal gallery will be the only one east of Montreal to display the collection.

Getting the show is a real coup for Dalhousie, O'Brien says.

"When we found out that we had it, you could hear the corks popping all over the campus."

Part of her pitch to the organizers was the fact that there are 15 well known medieval scholars in the Halifax area alone. The area also has a number of organizations devoted to various aspects of medieval life, and they are eager to participate in events surrounding the exhibition, O'Brien says.

On the first weekend in October, for instance, the Society for Creative Anachronism is putting on sword-combat exhibitions, group dances, songs by wandering minstrels and a trade fair of medieval-style jewelry, pottery and other items. The Early Music Society of Nova Scotia is organizing a medieval high mass on the same weekend at a local cathedral, and a benefit concert for the Society at the Sir James Dunn Theatre. Also planned for that weekend are a costume workshop and a medieval feast.

The gallery also is planning a series of lectures and films in September and early October in the Arts Centre.

And a number of King's and Dal faculty members — in such fields as history, classics, English and medicine — have agreed to open their classrooms to the public when they're lecturing on medieval subjects: medieval music, Gothic architecture and painting, medieval England and Europe. Reservations for a seat at these lectures can be made through the art gallery.

In conjunction with the travelling exhibition, there will be an exhibition in the art gallery's front alcove of rare incunabula (books and illuminated manuscripts produced before the year 1500) and of post-1500 material, all from Dalhousie and King's collections.

O'Brien says she's been amazed by the number and variety of people who are intrigued by the idea of a medieval celebration.

"It really does seem to excite people's imagination," she says.

Partly, she says, that interest stems from the popularization of the Middle Ages by books like Umberto Eco's The Name of the Rose (which has been made into a movie) and Barbara Tuchman's A Distant Mirror. □

Biochemistry prof wins alumni award

Biochemistry professor Christopher Helleiner says he has had "less than 10 seconds of instruction" on how to teach.

He obviously has natural talent. This spring, he won the 1986-87 Alumni Award for Teaching Excellence. Winners of the award are selected by a committee of faculty, alumni and students, after studying nominations from the university community.

Helleiner, 57, who teaches medical students and undergraduate science students, came to Dalhousie in 1963 after six years at the University of Toronto and the Ontario Cancer Institute.

One of his maxims is: Be prepared. "If you're unsure of something, a big class can sense it," he says. "If there's a degree of uncertainty in your voice, they'll be on you." If you don't know the answer to a question, "the thing to do is admit you don't know."

He also likes to keep his classes well organized. "I tell my students ahead of time what I'm going to try to prove to them. I take pains to keep them alert by using clinical examples."

Humor helps, too. "Like a good many people, I'm basically a ham."

He uses slides, and tries to explain the practical relevance of his subject, especially because many medical students find biochemistry unappealing. "Biochemistry is a very basic subject. The medical students want to go to work on the patients right away." But they need the basics, he says.

"Medical people have a strong desire for practicality in their education. Practicality of itself becomes training and not education. Tomorrow's clinicians will be doing something there will be no training for, so they need the basic education."

Helleiner, who was born in Austria, fled that country in 1939 with his parents and younger brother. After living in England for less than a year, the family settled in Toronto. He received his PhD in 1955 from the University of Toronto, where his father was an historian.

Helleiner and his wife, Mary, executive director of the Nova Scotia Law Foundation, have two grown daughters and two grandchildren. □

Dalhousie Alumni are invited to attend a series of special lectures on several plays by William Shakespeare

Listening to Shakespeare

Shakespeare's plays are not simple. Out of talk, action, and spectacle, they grow to something rich and strange. Four lecture-discussions will deal consecutively with Richard III, Romeo and Juliet, Twelfth Night, and Julius Caesar. Attention will be given to what is said by the characters, and to what audiences should listen for, while attending the theatre or viewing television, in order best to follow Shakespeare's plays and to deepen an appreciation of his insights.

Dr. Sprott has been for years a distinguished professor of literature at Dalhousie. Now in retirement, he looks forward to sharing with a wider audience his lifelong interest in Shakespeare.

They make beautiful music together

And Dal brought them together. Today, flautist Tim Hutchins and pianist Janet Creaser are winning bravos in big-city musical circles. But they're not singing farewell to Nova Scotia

By Marian Bruce, photos by Shane Kelley

When Montreal musician Tim Hutchins was agonizing over whether to accept a job as first flautist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra four years ago, he and his wife, Janet Creaser, applied the Nova Scotia Test: They got in their car and tried driving from Halifax to New York to see how it would feel — how long it would take, what the route was like.

To the relief of the couple's many fans in Montreal, New York failed the test: Hutchins decided to stay with the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, where he has been premier flautist for the past 10 years.

There were several reasons for this, of course, and all of them tell you something about Hutchins and Creaser, who both graduated from Dalhousie's department of music in 1977.

For a start, they are not the kind of people who will sacrifice everything for career. Hutchins has said that, while joining the prestige-laden New York orchestra would mean an automatic advance in his career, he wanted to be part of the maturing process of the Montreal Symphony. And he wasn't sure he wanted the stress of living in a city as big and fast-paced and urban as New York.

"New York is a fantastic city, and the New York Philharmonic is a fantastic orchestra, so it did take a lot of decision-making," he says. "In New York, you're at the centre of the whole cultural life of North America. But there's more to life than being at the centre. For a lot of people, their whole thing is career, and their bodies don't count, and by the time they're 40, they look pretty whacked out."

But another significant factor in the decision was that, on the drive from Halifax to New York on the freeway, the two cities began to seem very far apart, not only geographically but also psychologically.

"I think we wanted to find the connection between New York and Nova Scotia, if there was one," Creaser says. "When we drive home to Nova Scotia from Montreal, we travel on a country road all the way, and that road is sort of a connection in our minds. We drove on the freeway to New York, and 300 miles outside New York we already had that urban feeling."

Tim Hutchins and Janet Creaser do not seem like urban people.

He is a gentle, low-key, bearded man; she is pretty and warm, with the kind of natural sweetness of personality one might expect from a small-town clergyman's daughter, which she happens to be. They live in a four-storey, brick house on the side of a hill in Westmount, Montreal's toniest suburb. But their beige-and-white living room, which is dominated by two pianos, is decorated with color photos of the outdoors, some taken by Creaser — Alpine huts, a lake in the Rockies — and by a collection of miniature hooked mats made by Cape Breton Island women.

Besides music, the great passion the couple share is a love of nature and the outdoors.

Whenever they can, they head back to the Maritimes to camp, explore the remotest of country roads by car and bicycle, canoe and hike through the woods and along the rugged Nova Scotia coastline.

In Montreal, they make do by taking an hour out every day to cross-country ski, walk through the winding, hilly streets of Westmount, or climb to a little forest of hardwood trees on top of the hill Westmount people call a mountain.

“We go up on the mountain and listen to the song of the birds and rejoice in being alive”

"Those walks are very important to us," Creaser says. "They're not just aerobic exercises. It's sort of a spiritual thing. We go up on the mountain and listen to the song of the birds and rejoice in being alive. When we feel life that deeply, that goes into our music-making. Music comes from the part of people that is the deepest core — the deepest and the best."

Their schedules are too busy to devote any more time to the outdoor life they love. They're so much in demand as musicians — solo and duo concerts, recording, studio work and teaching — they can and sometimes do work seven days and many nights a week. Creaser, whose career was interrupted and almost ended by a car accident in 1979, has been working hard at making a comeback; she's been playing at what she feels is her pre-accident level only in the past year or two. Hutchins has spent the past 10 years building a name for himself in music circles throughout the continent, and collecting rave reviews for his live performances and recordings.

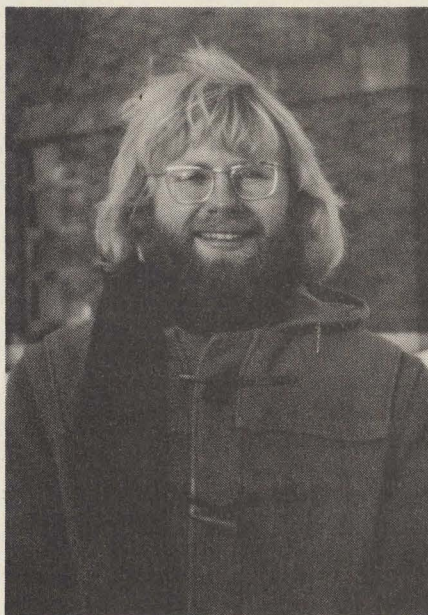

He caught the attention of American musical heavyweights in the summer of 1983, when he went on a three-week tour of the United States with the New York Philharmonic. In August, a selection jury for the orchestra unanimously chose him over 200 musicians who auditioned for the position of first flautist.

When word got around Montreal about the New York Philharmonic job offer, Eric MacLean, classical music critic for The Gazette in Montreal, wrote: "Perhaps the government could be persuaded to pass an emergency bill declaring Hutchins a National Treasure (which is only the truth) and therefore non-exportable." Arthur Kaptainis, another music critic for the newspaper, wrote after Hutchins did a guest spot in May 1986 with the chamber music group I Musici de Montréal: "It is hard to put a finger on what makes Hutchins one of the most hypnotically attractive flute players alive. Part of it may be his knack for making every note of a quickly rising scale a little explosion of golden color. He seems to liberate the musicality of florid passages other players treat as thickets best cleared with a quick stroke of the machete."

In February 1985, when the Montreal Symphony was on a tour of Japan and Hongkong, the South China Morning Post singled out Hutchins's flute solo in the Flute Concerto by Jacques Ibert as "a crystal performance, distinguished by clarity of sound and technical mastery." The Hongkong Standard said he demonstrated "exemplary brilliance." Critics also have singled out Hutchins for exceptional praise for his work on the Montreal Symphony's hit recording of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which has won numerous international prizes since it was released.

Montreal soprano Barbara Lewis praises Creaser for her "deep commitment to finding the truth in a piece of music and making that truth known to the audience" and for her ability to produce a "beautiful sung tone" — a long, spun line, the way vocalists sing — at the piano. "Her ability to do that makes it very easy to sing with her."

But Creaser has never had the kind of publicity her husband has, partly because she suffers from the pianists' occupational complaint: critics often see them as playing only minor, supporting roles.

When Creaser and Hutchins performed a flute-piano recital at McGill University's Pollack Hall in the fall of 1983 — a concert in which the piano part figured prominently — the headline on The Gazette review read: "Flautist Hutchins Puts on Spectacular Recital." In his glowing review, music critic MacLean kissed off Creaser's contribution in 20 words: "His partner, Janet Creaser, knows his style and shadows every phrase, which is understandable, since she is also his wife."

In fact, it is not because they are married that Creaser and Hutchins play beautiful music together. The music their special chemistry as a duo, came first, long before either of them had ever thought about romance. For both musicians, music has been a way of life since childhood.

Creaser, the daughter of a Presbyterian minister with roots in Lunenburg County, N.S., grew up in a musical family in New Glasgow, N.S. One of her grandparents was George Lethbridge, organist at St. Paul's Cathedral in London, Ont., who studied in Paris under the great French organist composer Charles-Marie Widor. Another grandparent, Marie Creaser, was organist at a church in Rose Bay, N.S. "I don't remember life without music," Creaser says. "I started fiddling around the piano when I was two." She began piano lessons with her mother at age five and violin lessons at age seven. A one time, she was studying piano, violin, organ and voice all at the same time. "I remember practising at lunchtime after school and in the evenings. But don't remember it as drudgery at all. My dad would often play the piano while played the violin, and my sister also played violin, so it was very much family thing. It was love for music, and it was just part of life."

Hutchins also came from a musical family; one of his grandparents was a professional trumpet player and his uncles all played brass instruments. He was born in Winchester, England, lived in Australia with his family for about five years, and moved to Halifax in 1960. His father, an engineer in the Canadian navy, began teaching Tim recorder when he was six and flute about a year later. "In music, it's a good thing to get time early in life to get at least physically acquainted with the instrument," Hutchins says. "To do professionally, playing an instrument has to be like talking, almost. So the sooner you get going at it, the better. Six is a pretty good age to start."

When his family moved back to Winchester for a few years, Hutchins finished high school in England and then enrolled in the Guildhall School of Music and Drama in London. Coincidentally, Janet Creaser was also in London at that time, studying at the Royal College of Music.

The paths of the two young musicians had crossed a few times in the past when they were performing at mus-festivals in Nova Scotia, although they had never actually met. In London, they attended some of the same concerts, they now realize.

But it was Dal that finally brought them together.

In 1974, Hutchins returned to Nova Scotia because he wanted to live in Canada, and because he wanted to broaden his education with some non-music courses. (One of them was geology, which he liked so much, he toyed for about a year with the idea of switching to that field.)

At Dal, Hutchins studied flute with Elizabeth Dubois and Stephen Pedersen from the Atlantic Symphony Orchestra and with Jeanne Baxtresser of the Montreal Symphony. Creaser studied piano with William Tritt. She also taught piano at Dal, and was doing "tons of accompanying," making enough money from her work to support herself and indulge in a Honda Civic.

Her favorite musical partner was Tim Hutchins. "There was nothing romantic," she says. "We were just really good friends. But it was like a figure-skating team. There was some real chemistry that worked. I knew it, and Tim knew it, and the people that used to listen to us in Halifax knew it."

She won the university medal when she graduated from Dal; he graduated with first-class honors. She left for the University of British Columbia in the fall of 1977 to work on her master's degree; he went to McGill for his.

In the spring of 1978, Hutchins auditioned for the Montreal Symphony, and — "to my surprise," he says — landed the job of first flautist. At the time, he was 23. One of the first people he called with the news was his old buddy Janet Creaser.

The following year, she decided to leave Vancouver and head back to Halifax to work as an accompanist and to sort things out with her boyfriend. In the fall of 1979, she was driving across the country, her little Honda laden with her belongings, when, on an impulse, she stopped at a gas station outside Montreal and called her old buddy Tim Hutchins to say hello. He asked her to stay for lunch. She agreed. And, except for visits, she never did make it back to Nova Scotia.

"Even that first day we had lunch in Old Montreal, I had this uncanny feeling (about the relationship)," Creaser says. "I went to Nova Scotia for a few days, and told my aunt in Lunenburg that I had a feeling I was going to marry Tim. I felt it was destiny or something."

In Montreal, she lined up several CBC recitals as a solo artist and with other performers. Then her career crashed to a standstill.

On a cold, clear, starry night in December 1979, Hutchins and Creaser were in the back seat of a car on their way to a concert in Vermont by New York Philharmonic flautist Julius Baker. Creaser was thinking about how pleased she was to be in the country again. Suddenly, an oncoming car went out of control on a patch of ice and smashed into their vehicle.

Walking home from class, 1977

Hutchins broke his jaw in the accident and was off work for two months. Janet broke her back in three places.

Because of a misunderstanding at the hospital she was taken to outside Montreal (one doctor thought another had x-rayed her back), nobody realized how serious her injuries were for an entire week.

"They had me up walking around, even though I was in a nightmare of pain," she recalls. "It was a French hospital, and what little French I had at that time, I couldn't communicate with them. It took them a week to x-ray my back. The second they found out that it was broken, they had me flat on my back, not moving, and rushed me to the Montreal General Hospital."

She was in the hospital for two months and flat on her back for many more. She couldn't play the piano for two years.

"It was an unbelievable strain. Music had been kind of my life. I had always been told, everywhere, that I had a gift, as Tim had been told, and not being able to use it was really frustrating.

"That first year, I found it painful to even listen to piano music. Things that I had done I couldn't listen to."

For about four years, even sitting was painful. When she started trying to play again, she was unable to perform pieces she had played as a child. She took a good five years to struggle back to her pre-accident level.

After the accident, she taught at McGill University, the McGill Conservatory of Music and Concordia University. She now teaches privately and works freelance, touring and recording with the Montreal Symphony, performing in films and giving recitals with a number of artists, including Hutchins.

His taxing work schedule includes juggling his main job with the Montreal Symphony; teaching at McGill, where he's an assistant professor; studio work — commercial jingles, film soundtracks — and live concerts.

It's a full life for both musicians, but both feel they are at a crossroads.

They want to record as a flute-piano duo (they already have an offer from a British recording company), and start going on concert tours. "We don't have anything definite planned," Creaser says, "but what we talk about all the time is about branching out, leaving the orchestra business and working as a duo."

Their dream is to move back some day to Nova Scotia, get a house by the sea, and use that home as a base — preparing concerts at home, and touring for a month or two at a time.

That would require hiring a manager, something Hutchins and Creaser have been a bit reluctant to do so far, because it would mean losing some control over their own lives.

"How we live our lives is more important than our careers," Creaser says. "The really important things in our life are family, very close and dear friends, the interaction we have with fellow musicians and students.

"We seem to make our decisions on the basis of what's true to us. That had a lot to do with the decision not to go to New York. And what's true to us is tied in to our roots.

"If we ever became famous as a duo, I don't think we would change much as people. It would still be the simple things in life that would mean most to us." □

Purdy Crawford, 55, is one of the most influential corporate lawyers in the country and the chief executive officer of the $4.3-billion-a-year Montreal tobacco giant Imasco Ltd., but he's never forgotten the day, more than 30 years ago, that the Dalhousie Law School chose not to give him a medal for placing third in his graduating class. The school awarded no medals that year, and it annoyed young Crawford that no one ever explained why.

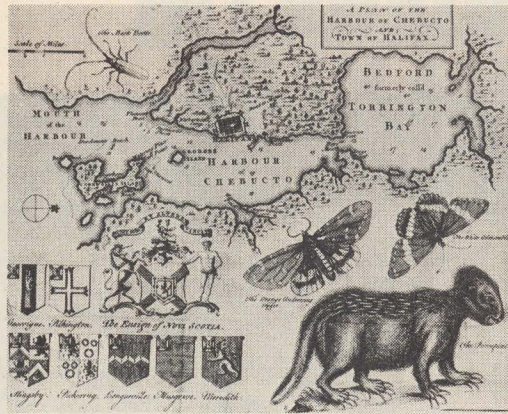

Dalhousie, he concedes, certainly gave him other things. A sense of purpose, for instance. It was at Dal that he really decided to become a lawyer, and discovered the type of law he wanted to practise. "I didn't always agree with my professors, or the way they did things," he says, "but I had to admit they were superb legal thinkers. I began to develop a sense of my own future. I was particularly interested in corporate law. And, like most young people, I wanted to be successful."

Remembering his professors at the law school, he says, "I guess Graham Murray was the best teacher I had," but sometimes Murray's refusal to answer questions frustrated him, and left him confused. "So I decided I'd just go out and figure things out for myself."

Figure things out he did. He went to Harvard, and excelled. He came back to Halifax, passed his bar exams, landed a job with a prominent law firm in Toronto, and climbed to the top to become a senior partner. He helped draft new laws for the trading of securities in Ontario. He taught the first course in Canada in corporate finance. He became a director of several of the country's biggest corporations, including Dominion Textile Inc., Inco Ltd., and, of course, Imasco Ltd., where he is now the undisputed commander-in-chief.

Industry analysts and corporate insiders use words like diligent, straightforward, honest, loyal, and smart to describe Crawford. He, however, prefers to cast himself as a sly man, who enjoys the company of his wife and six children at his home in Montreal as much as the victories of the corporate battlefield. "There are many ways to define success," he says. "One thing is important. Be self-reliant and hard-working. And never forget where you came from."

"Be self-reliant and hard-working. And never forget where you came from"

Crawford came from Five Islands, N.S., a community of barely 150 souls when he was born in 1931. He was the only child of a second marriage. He had two half-brothers on his father's side, and a half-sister on his mother's. His father, Frank, was a coal-miner who worked in Springhill. Young Purdy went to a two-room school in Bas River until the tenth grade, but graduated to a four-room school for Grades 11 and 12.

Nothing in his childhood actually drew him to the law. No one in his family had ever pursued an education beyond high school. His mother, Grace, hoped he'd become a teacher. "I liked school," Crawford recalls. "I had pretty good marks. We didn't have a television set so I didn't get a chance to watch Perry Mason. But I guess I wanted to go to university, and learn something, and maybe see what happened."

Mount Allison University accepted him in 1949. He studied history and political science, and did well enough to win a small scholarship. He also became a chum of John Buchanan, who hadn't yet charted his course for Nova Scotia's premiership. "John and I roomed together for a couple of years," Crawford says. "He was interested in politics and I was interested in history, so we made a good pair. We sort of operated the hockey rink together. We were responsible for taking the tickets and guarding the receipts. We were also dishwashers in the university cafeteria from time to time."

Crawford was only 20 when he graduated from Mount Allison in 1952. But he had a firm enough hunch about what he wanted to do that he applied for admission to the Dalhousie Law School. He was surprised his class boasted only 40 students, and a little intimidated by the academic ability of some of them. "Many were much more sophisticated than me," he remembers. "They came from a variety of backgrounds and they were all pretty smart. I had to compete against people like Constance Glube, who later became Chief Justice, Trial Division, of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia."

Despite his fears, he placed first in his first year, and remained within the top three during the rest of his time at Dalhousie. "I worked hard, and I spent a lot of time studying. I was well into my second year before I really started to ask questions, and pursue things on my own. Anything I didn't understand I could always find out."

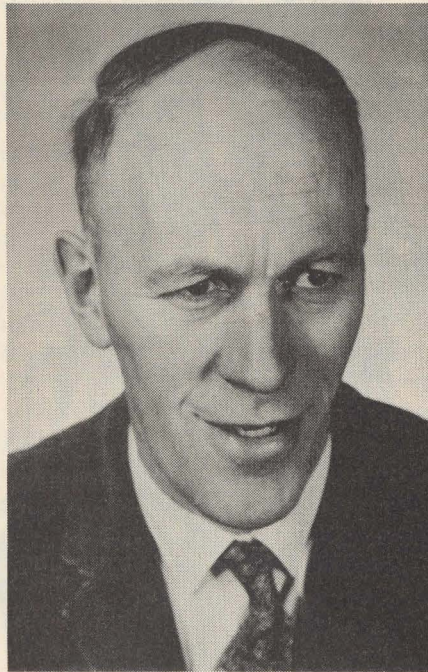

But life wasn't all hard work. Among his favorite diversions was interfaculty hockey. He played defence for the law school, and while he wasn't an ace on the ice he had his moments. The high point of his amateur career came in his second year when his team beat the medical school for the championship. It was the first victory for the law school since the Great Depression.

In his second year, he also courted and married Beatrice, a Bass River girl who's still his wife. After bouncing from one residence to another, they finally set up their first real, if humble, home in a tiny apartment on Barrington St. It cost them $30 a month, and what with the cost of food, clothes and books, they barely made ends meet.

Encouraging talented students to continue their legal education was a tradition at the law school. Crawford went to Harvard for his Master of Laws degree, and studied under some outstanding teachers. One of them was Archibald Cox, who later became the Solicitor General of the United States and a Watergate prosecutor. Crawford also became a close friend of a fellow Canadian student named Donald Macdonald. This was the same Donald Macdonald who'd later serve as finance minister in a Trudeau government, and later still as the head of a royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. As Harvard students, Crawford and Macdonald often met for lunch off campus and stayed late into the evening to discuss politics, economics, and the law. These were heady times for Crawford. His intellect blossomed, and so did his conviction that he'd like to live in a major city.

"Harvard made me a lot of friends," he says. "It certainly opened up some doors for me. I wanted to be a corporate lawyer, and I thought the best place to work was in a big metropolitan centre. My only problem was figuring out exactly where I should go."

Graham Murray was a favorite teacher

He came back to Halifax in 1956, and articulated for the law firm Daley, Ritchie, Black and Moreira. He worked as a clerk for senior partner Roland Ritchie (BA'30, LLD'65), who eventually became a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. Crawford was called to the Nova Scotia Bar in 1957, and later that year got a junior position with the Toronto firm Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt. An associate lawyer there until 1962, he then became a full partner. He was a senior partner from 1970 to 1985, when he left the firm to join Imasco Ltd. as president and chief operating officer. Among his accomplishments at Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt, he is most proud of having recruited several young lawyers who later distinguished themselves for the firm.

But he'd also distinguished himself outside the firm. Over the years, he'd honed his corporate-law skills, particularly with respect to financing acquisitions and expansions. His abilities were recognized in 1966 when he worked with some of Canada's leading corporate lawyers on the Kimber Committee, a federally appointed body whose task was to review the laws governing securities trading in Ontario. The committee's recommendations became the foundation of securities legislation in Canada. Expertise Crawford had acquired at Harvard helped him start teaching tax law at Osgoode Hall in Toronto. Then, in 1969, the University of Toronto Law School invited him to teach a course in corporate finance. It was the first of its kind in Canada, and became a model for subsequent courses.

Crawford can't recall the exact point at which he decided to leave law for business and high finance. The transition was smooth, natural, seemingly inevitable: "Over the years, I found myself getting interested in business and the corporate world. I knew quite a bit about corporate financing and how various industries and companies worked."

As a successful lawyer, he had been asked to join several boards of corporations. But in the summer of 1985, after he had spent a decade as a director of Imasco Ltd. — a diversified, consumer-products corporation — Imasco elected him president and chief operating officer. He quit Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt, and after more than 20 years in Toronto, moved to Montreal. A year later, he became Imasco's chief executive officer.

Crawford refuses to reveal much about life in the corner suite, except to say that every day offers a new challenge. But since taking Imasco's reins, he's concentrated on diversification into a variety of consumer products. While cigarettes — particularly the Player's brand — are Imasco's main item, the company also owns fast-food chains and drugstores.

Crawford keeps a summer home in Five Islands. He's chairman of the board of regents of Mount Allison, and alumni captain for Dalhousie's capital campaign.

"I respect those who do what they want in the way they want to do it," he says. "I have a friend in New Brunswick, for example. He lives an outdoorsy sort of life. He fishes, canoes and skis. He's a guide, so he's unemployed for a good part of the year. But he's happy with that. He seems to have built quite a respectable life for himself."

Unquestionably, so has Purdy Crawford — a long way from home. □

Do you remember '67?

By Marian Bruce, illustration by Derek Sarty

Fram's record store was advertising "smash new albums" by Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Gordon Lightfoot and The Doors. A psychedelic lights-and-music room, The Trip, had just opened in downtown Halifax. Dalhousie's student council was trying to get a seat on the university Senate.

And the Dalhousie Gazette was trying to stop the war in Vietnam.

It was 1967, the year Che Guevara died — a year of turning on and dropping out, a year of protest songs and marches, a year of rebellion and discontent.

In Canada, life was relatively tranquil. The nation was celebrating its 100th birthday, marred only slightly by a flap over French President Charles De Gaulle's famous "Vive le Québec Libre" speech in Montreal. Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson opened Expo '67, and reshuffled his cabinet later that year to give John Turner a cabinet portfolio as registrar-general. Robert Stanfield (BA '36, LLD '81) was elected leader of the federal Progressive Conservative party.

But in the United States (where Ronald Reagan, by the way, was a state governor), people were at war at home and abroad. Blacks were rioting in Hartford, Conn., in Harlem, in New Jersey, in Cincinnati, in Cairo, Ill. H. Rap Brown, exhorting Blacks to burn down Washington, D.C., observed that violence was "as American as cherry pie."

And President Lyndon Johnson was stepping up bombing raids in the war in Vietnam.

For a while, Dalhousie's student newspaper was preoccupied with that war — sometimes, it seemed, forgetting about the less exciting news in Canada and on campus.

The Oct. 19 issue had an entire page of anti-war songs by Gazette editor Kim Cameron. An example, to be sung to the tune of "This Land Is Your Land":

*Well I was walking that Ho Chi Minh Trail and there beside me I saw an entrail
A human baby, a napalmed baby
Waving his stumps for you and me.*

The week before, the editorial page featured a cartoon of Lyndon Johnson shackled to a gorilla labelled "growing doubt about the war." And the next month, the editorial page cartoon showed falling bombs labelled "all the way with LBJ."

An entire page in that issue was devoted to a Vietnam protest rally in Victoria Park, attended by 300 people. The speakers included Chris Thurrott, a graduate student in sociology, Nigel Rodley, professor of international law, and Allan O'Brien, mayor of Halifax. On the sidelines was a group of 20 or 30 counter-demonstrators, chanting, "All the way with LBJ."

In its not-quite-impartial news story on the event, the Gazette noted that "thunderous applause followed the mayor's speech, drowning out the incessant obscenities being hurled by the fanatical Johnsonphiles arrayed behind the speakers' platform."

There is some evidence that The Gazette was not a perfect reflection of its readers' interests.

At a student council meeting in early November, Jim Farr presented a motion of censure — seconded by Faith McEwen — against the newspaper for its page of anti-war songs. Jennifer Johnson criticized the newspaper for the amount of space it devoted to Vietnam.

An alternative newspaper, The Worm, sprang up, promising to cover campus news that The Gazette neglected.

And the editorial in the Gazette's Nov. 2 issue noted that the paper's editorial policy had "sparked a certain amount of controversy" on campus in recent weeks. Explaining that policy, the editor argued that the paper's most important role was not to cover campus events but to promote dialogue on important issues, "whether in the context of the university or the world."

On campuses everywhere, the big issue — for the student politicians, at least — was student power. In Victoria, B.C., more than 2,000 students marched on the legislature, demanding an end to tuition fees and more student involvement in the university government. At Ontario's University of Waterloo, the student council threatened a strike over the student-power issue. At Cornell, 1,000 students rioted over censorship of a campus literary magazine. At Dalhousie, students were flexing their muscles in a relatively polite way.

In September, student council president Dennis Ashworth presented a brief to the University Senate demanding student representation on the governing body. (Students got a seat the following January.)

The student aspirations did not please Halifax's Chronicle-Herald, which grumbled in an editorial that the youth revolution had gone far enough, thank you, and that young people should beware of demanding too much or of "confusing licence with liberty."

That editorial infuriated The Gazette. Accusing the daily of toeing a "neo-fascist line," the student paper, with unblushing overstatement, compared the argument of the Chronicle-Herald to one used by Alabama Governor George Wallace "when dealing with the Negroes in Mississippi. It is the same one which the white racists use in explaining their action in Rhodesia."

The popular media of the day hardly reflected the turmoil on and off campus. People were flocking to see Barefoot in the Park, with Jane Fonda and Robert Redford; To Sir with Love with Sidney Poitier; Alfie with Michael Caine. Best-selling books of the year included The Medium is the Message by Marshall McLuhan; Games People Play by Eric Berne; The Hobbit by J. R. R. Tolkien; Christy by Catherine Marshall.

And, on campus, life was by no means all sit-ins and protest marches.

At Dalhousie, there was a lot of talk about a proposed new arts centre.

The Gazette called it "a $4-million white elephant," and reported that 80 per cent of 20 students polled about the new centre said they would prefer a better place to eat and meet each other.

That place was on its way. Students were being asked to vote in a referendum on whether they'd be willing to pay an extra $10 in student union fees (for a total of $44) to help meet capital and administration costs of a proposed, $3.7-million Student Union Building.

With or without a SUB, students continued to enjoy their little diversions. One, The Gazette reported, was called "Raid."

The game started on Saturday mornings when female students slipped across the fields to the men's residence and "with feminine grace," banged on the door of each male student's room. In Cameron House, which hadn't yet acquired locks, the girls could "force their way in and really surprise the groaning forms lying on the bed." The newspaper doesn't say what happened next, except that some of the visitors were thrown into cold showers.

And at 3 a.m. the next day, the boys would retaliate by first battering on the doors of Shirreff Hall, then crying, "Take it off!" until "some of the more spirited girls delve into their drawers and throw nylons or bras out the open upper-storey windows as peace offerings."

More in keeping with the preoccupation of the Sixties, however, were visits to what the Gazette called "groovy" coffee houses. A psychedelic-light joint, The Trip, had just opened on Blowers St. between Grafton and Argyle streets. Run by folksinger Doug Kennedy and student Ed Sampson, The Trip featured colored lights projected on a wall, "producing a psychedelic sensation for the viewer," the Gazette reported.

"When combined with music of the type known as acid rock or Chicago blues, it transports the subject into a world where reality is lost and the unreal becomes the rule." Many customers went to The Trip out of curiosity. "They have all heard of psychedelic drugs and the people who take them, THE HIPPIES, and they want to see them for themselves."

Predictably, the student newspaper favored the legalization of one drug, marijuana, which it described as "a safe, non-narcotic, non-addictive, cheap and easily obtained form of diversion."

And predictably, the newspaper worried about apartheid, the resignation of U.S. Defence Secretary Robert McNamara ("the one restraining force in the U.S. Military Complex") and the death of Che Guevara.

"Death caught up with Che in the jungles of Bolivia," an article by staff reporter Nick Pittas observed. "But the gangsters who rule the capitalist world and their puppets in the Third World can sleep no easier tonight. Che's example shines like a torch, for the oppressed peoples the world over to pick up." □

Here's good news about insurance

There's more good news about the group insurance program endorsed by the Alumni Association five years ago.

First, the unit value has been raised to $30,000 (it was $25,000 in 1982), with the same low premiums as when the plan started. That's a 20-per-cent increase in value, and a significant reduction in the cost of your protection.

And maximums now are up to $360,000 for a member, and to $720,000 for member and spouse.

One of the plan's unique features is the insurance continuation benefit, which guarantees $3,000 worth of coverage for each unit of term life held at age 70 — premium-free for life. This benefit, which now is extended to spouse coverage, is a big plus, because most term plans end at age 65.

The program was designed for Dal alumni by North American Life, a Canadian company that provides insurance services for the alumni of 34 Canadian universities and colleges.

Low premium rates give the plan a competitive edge. For example, a non-smoking male, 30 to 34, would pay less than 40 cents a day for $120,000 of coverage. Rates for females are even lower.

An information package with details of the improvements was sent to alumni in June. If you missed the mailing and want to know more about the plan, contact your North American Life representative or call the company toll-free at 1-800-268-6687. You can also call Brad Finigan, the Dal Alumni insurance consultant, at (902) 465-4584.

Dental Hygiene grads to meet

The School of Dental Hygiene will celebrate the 25th anniversary of its first graduating class next year with a variety of events, including class reunions and a continuing education program in Halifax June 24 to 26.

Graduates who can't come to Halifax are being encouraged to celebrate with special events in their own area.

McCurdy to hold stoneware show

An exhibition of decorative stoneware by Alexandra McCurdy (Arts '66) will be held at Gallery 1667 in Halifax Nov. 5.

McCurdy's work revives the geometric porcupine-quill patterns once used by the Micmac Indians. Instead of quills, birch bark and dyes, she uses glazes and high-fired white stoneware to produce Micmac-inspired vessels.

There are two uncommon things available at every Wacky Wheatley's Store in Atlantic Canada — The first one is a low price — the second may surprise you...

It's product knowledge. No discount electronics store spends more time training their staff than Wacky Wheatley's.

Not only do we sell black and white T.V.'s for $69.00, we also sell 28" monitors for $2000.00.

And the difference between the two is more than just $1931.00.

So, next time you're in the market for a microwave, VCR, color T.V., stereo system, camcorder, or whatever — drop into a Wacky Wheatley's Store. You'll find a price you just can't beat, and knowledgeable sales staff.
